

NEW YORKISMS.

From Our Own Correspondent. NEW YORK, July 6, 1870. Terrace Garden. The other day I wrote you a short account of Central Park Garden, and of the great improvement that had taken place there during the past three years, and particularly during the last year. Terrace Garden is such a remarkable contrast, both in point of respectability and in the character of the performances, as to deserve a separate letter all to itself.

Terrence Garden is the name given to a summer garden situated at the intersection of Third Avenue and Fifty-eighth street. It is so called because the grounds included in the enclosure rise in a succession of terraces. It is reached through the agonizing process of a ride in the Third Avenue cars. This is a painful and disgusting trial of one's patience and good taste at the very best. The Third Avenue cars are the dirtiest, the most crowded, the most foul smelling cars in the city, and are patronized by the roughest and most repugnantly perfumed passengers to be found in the metropolis. They are overlaid morning, noon, and night. Unless you get in at a terminus it is next to impossible to obtain a seat. In summer you are lucky if you escape insectivorous contagion. At midnight you are never certain that you will get off without your pocket being picked or your head being broken. Some decent people, of course, are forced to take to them for the simple reason that a more exclusive conveyance is more expensive. But the mass of the passengers are rough, and a large proportion of them are vicious of nature and vile in appearance. How refined women could ride up in them to attend such a pretentious affair as the Rink concerts, I don't understand. Still they are crowded nightly now—even during the sweltering nights of last week—with men and women, mad after the lager and weiss bier, the open air, and the opera bouffe of Terrace Garden.

The entrance to the garden is on Fifty-eighth street, a little to the west of Third Avenue. You go up a short, narrow flight of steps, and find yourself in a large oblong enclosure, which upon three sides of you rises in triple terraces. Some of these terraces are laid with sod, and planted with trees and lamp-posts, both of which are apparently at an early stage of their existence, since the trees are sparing of foliage and the lamps are sparing of light. The shades of evening and the demi-semi-radiance melting together make a sort of artificial twilight not altogether disagreeable. Upon the topmost terrace, on one side, are accommodations for a small orchestra. On the other, chairs and tables are arranged. It is yet early. The attendance has not increased to a crowd. The gladsly remains of sunset struggle with the sick glimmerings of the early twilight. There is a larger sprinkling of women and children than of men. These are seated at the tables, eating strawberry ice-cream with pewter spoons, and sipping the pink frigidly with sips of the inevitable lager. The orchestra is tuning its instruments. A bevy of early comers besets the entrance to the summer theatre, a small, square one-story wooden theatre hastily thrown up this summer for the accommodation of German opera bouffe. It will seat an audience of five hundred. When half-past eight shall have arrived the opera will commence.

Let us take a glimpse at summer-German opera bouffe and at summer-German opera bouffe audiences. Half-past eight has arrived. The small hall is nearly full. The evening is relentlessly hot, so much so that the perspiration flows in liberal streams down the faces of the embarrassed ushers, and bedews the floor like drops from a watering-pot. It would be no figure of speech to say that the lager runs from them in rills. Owing to an awkward way of numbering the seats, the ushers experience a good deal of confusion in finding the numbers corresponding to those called for on the coupons presented by ticket-holders. For instance, there are about twenty rows of chairs, and each row will seat twenty-five people. The coupons are numbered both with the number of the row and with the number of the seat on that row—thus row 1, seat 16; row 7, seat 15. In the hurry of completion, however, the person having charge of that department has omitted to attach to every row a label indicating its number, so that when an usher has to seat an individual according to the figures on the coupon, he has to count the number of rows from the stage back, until he "spots" the one which the coupon calls for. It frequently happens that, in the confusion of waiting upon a crowd, he makes a miscalculation, and then what a scene takes place when the mistake is discovered, and the right party finds some one else in his place! Sometimes, also, a voluble woman, with two or three young ones, seeing upon the backs of the seats before her the numbers called for by the coupon she holds, forgets that the numbers on the backs of seats represent those of the row immediately behind, and insists upon climbing over and taking possession of chairs she imagines to be hers. In this way I once saw a German woman and her family climb over a dozen rows, chattering in the most absurd manner the while, and bearing the indignant glances of the house with as much calmness as though they were doing the most natural thing in the world.

The Germans do not know how to give opera bouffe, and the summer season at Terrace Garden proves that they do not know how. Hitherto Canessa has taken the part of "Boulotte" and Habelmann that of "Barbe Bleue." Now Habelmann is a nice tenor and Canessa is a plump little "Höngroise," who, if her voice was only as melting and tender as her emboupoint, would draw excellent houses, not only in Chicago, where she is said to have made a success as "Boulotte," but pretty nearly everywhere. As it is, her voice is thin and seems to come from the head, not the heart, and she makes the mistake of singing with all her body instead of with all her soul. You feel sorry for both tenor and prima donna, that they should have thought it expedient to sing in such a place and before such an audience. The orchestra is the most remarkable specimen of the ingenuity with which musical duties and difficulties can be avoided. It plays hunkadee with them at the most inappropriate moments, and manifestly holds the conductor and the chorus in contempt. "Barbe Bleue's" troopers look as though they had selected their arms and accoutrements at a tinsmith's establishment, and no one would be surprised to learn that the original use of their helmets was not altogether disconnected with wash-basins. The height of the proscenium is about twice the height of the performer, and gives him an asceticism of stature that he could well afford to lose. The audience is exclusively composed of Germans, and when the curtain falls they rise en masse and repair to the nearest booths, where men, women, and children alike swell beer, and prepare for the next act. And so on to midnight, when the Third Avenue cars, crowded to an extent of which it is not easy to give an impression, stream down towards the City Hall, in long and wearisome trails.

KLINGERS & GATES' CAUTION.—In another column today our readers will find a timely "caution" from the extensive Cottage Furniture manufacturers, Messrs. Klingers & Gates, of this city. The furniture of this firm has deservedly attained a wide reputation, and the knavery of certain dealers has led them to sell the productions of other manufacturers as the Klingers & Gates article. In order to expose this imposition, and place the people on their guard, the latter firm have adopted the plan of stamping every article they manufacture with their initials and trade-mark.
